Forest types differ in soil, composition, adjoining soil, and their response to management of forest before logging and after harvest. In this case of mixed conifer, quite natural forest before management would naturally not of itself be an immediate concern. But system of such forest does in fact tend to require a complete soil and forest management, and these efforts to keep the forest healthy at all times or at least to keep the forest in a state of naturalness and to keep the forest in a state of naturalness and to keep the forest in a state of naturalness.
