Introduction

Transition of newly graduated registered nurses to practice is always a challenge as the new graduate nurses strive to deliver safe care in the midst of the heavy workloads and the added responsibility for patient care (Hussein et al 2017, p.2). The added responsibilities in the busy nursing practice require the new graduates to have attributes and skills in essential in nursing practice. Accordingly, the focus of this paper is to identify key features of belongingness, emotional intelligence, resilience and communication. The paper will then examine how the newly registered nurse can utilize these attributes and concepts in their nursing practice. Finally, the paper will examine how these concepts can support delivery of person-centred health care.

Explanation and examples of concepts

The concept of belongingness refers to the personal and contextually mediated experience that develops in accordance with the level to which a personal feels and experiences acceptance, security, respect, and appreciation by a specific group as well as the connection with the group, and the degree to which the individual's values correspond to the group's professional values (Ashktorab et al 2017, p.222). Belongingness is normally perceived as an essential factor when it comes to stress, self-esteem, motivation, and satisfaction in clinical setting (Ashktorab et al 2017, p.222). For example, new graduate nurses who experience a sense of belongingness during practice are more active and have high level of motivation in their practice (Qalehsari et al 2017, p. 5545).

The concept of emotional intelligence is defined as the interconnected emotional and social skills that influence how an individual understands and expresses themselves, relations, and how well an individual copes with everyday demands (Cleary et al 2018, p.112).
