

Credit Scoring

Background

Credit scoring has been used in consumer lending since the 1980's to predict whether a borrower would pay back a loan. The most common model used is one developed by Fair, Isaac and Co. A FICO credit score is based on these factors¹:

Payment history - 35%
Outstanding debt - 30%
Length of credit history – 15%
New credit – 10%
Types of credit in use – 10%

In the last 5 years, insurers have incorporated the use of credit scores in personal lines (auto and homeowners) insurance underwriting. Insurers believe that credit scores may predict moral hazards (intentional acts committed to collect insurance proceeds) or morale hazards (careless or irresponsible actions that increase the chance of loss). Insurers also cite a correlation between bad credit scores and higher loss ratios. Nearly every personal insurer in Washington now uses credit information for rating or underwriting purposes.

Consumer groups generally oppose the use of credit scores in insurance rating or underwriting. These groups believe data in credit reports are often inaccurate, and that use of credit scoring in insurance underwriting may be a proxy for "redlining"² – which is an illegal method of underwriting insurance.

This is not a new issue to the OIC or insurance regulators. On April 10, 1995, the Consumer Federation of America wrote to Commissioner Deborah Senn urging her to reject the use of credit reports as an underwriting criterion. On December 14, 1996, the NAIC issued a "white paper" on Credit Reports and Insurance Underwriting, which described issues surrounding the use of credit reports by insurers and proposed general recommendations for state insurance departments.

Insurance underwriting is a selection process. With personal insurance transactions becoming more automated to accommodate Internet shopping, insurers may try to move away from subjective underwriting – which is labor intensive. The use of credit scores and other objective data (such as traditional measures like driving record) facilitate on-line insurance quoting and sales.

² Redlining is simply marking a geographic area on a map and not selling insurance in that area. Historically it was used to avoid selling insurance in high crime areas – which typically had a higher proportion of low-income and minority residents.
