

Critical Reading Guide

The first step in critical reading is having a good understanding what is written in a particular text. If you only “sort of get it”, you will not be ready to move on to the higher cognitive demands of critical reading.

Read the text thoroughly and then reread any parts that you feel you don’t fully understand. You may find it helpful to read the text once through without writing any notes. On your second read, take notes and mark the main idea or claims of each section of the text. Ways you can annotate the text include:

- writing brief summaries of key points in the margins
- writing comments or definitions in the margins
- underlining or circling words, phrases, or sentences
- connecting ideas with lines or arrows
- numbering related points
- bracketing sections of the text
- making a note of anything that strikes you as interesting
- writing questions in the margins -- research or discussion
- writing connections between the text and self, other texts, or the world

To check your understanding of the text, it is a good idea to try to write a very brief summary of the text. If you are unable to do this, you need to go back and reread the text again.

Once you’ve thoroughly read and understood the text, you are ready to read it critically. Here, reading “critically” does not mean that you will only look for negatives in the text. The type of criticism involved here entails taking a text apart and asking questions so that you can understand and evaluate the background, the context, and the effect of the text before you.

While reading critically, you should have a list of questions that you are trying to answer. Here are some questions that will help guide your thinking in a critical manner:

General Comprehension Questions about the Argument and Content:

- What “conversation” is this text part of? What are the key terms necessary to understand the argument? Who are the main “players” involved in discussing this issue?
- What claim is being made? What are the main points the writer presents?
- What evidence is used to support those claims? Is it sufficient and reliable?
- What are the implications of the writer’s position if you were to carry it out? What would be the outcome of taking this position or course of action?

Questions about the text

- What genre is the text? How does that shape its structure and style?
