

FROG DISSECTION:

This lab is divided into 2 sections: external anatomy & internal anatomy. I find that it works well to do the external anatomy during one class period, leave the frogs mainly intact, then do the internal anatomy during another class period.

External Anatomy:

- Introduction to amphibian characteristics
- Label throat, thorax, abdomen, head, nostrils, eyes, tympanic membrane, legs, & webbed feet
- 2 student diagrams included for labeling.

Frog Dissection

Background Information:

The toad and the salamander are excellent examples of the amphibians. They have a mostly aquatic existence and have gills. The frog, on the other hand, is not an especially good representation of the class because it is quite well adapted to living on land. The advantage to studying the frog is that it is a good example of the vertebrates and its internal organs resemble those of more complex animals. In this investigation, you will examine the external structures of the frog.

Section 1: External Anatomy

1. Spread out the frog on the dissecting pan, ventral (belly) side down. Being an amphibian, the frog has smooth skin that can be used to exchange gases in addition to lungs. It has long, muscular hind legs for swimming and jumping, with webbed feet to assist swimming. The forelimbs are smaller to provide stability when sitting and jumping. The eyes are located on top of the head so that the frog can see when the rest of its body is under water. There is a snout, mouth, and nostril called a
