There are also other factors that contribute to the complexity of working with a client. For example, the client may have a history of trauma or other mental health issues that may affect their ability to engage in the process. The therapist must be able to identify these issues and work with the client to address them. This may involve providing support and resources, as well as helping the client to develop coping strategies. The therapist must also be able to work with the client to set realistic goals and expectations. This may involve helping the client to understand the limitations of the process and the role of the therapist. The therapist must also be able to work with the client to develop a plan for the future. This may involve helping the client to identify their strengths and weaknesses, as well as helping them to develop a plan for the future. The therapist must also be able to work with the client to develop a plan for the future.
