

Global pattern of air circulation
Atmospheric circulation is the large scale movement of air by which heat is distributed on the surface of the Earth.
Hadley cell	Largest cell which extends from the Equator to between 30° to 60° north & south.
Ferrel cell	Middle cell where air flows poleward between 30° & 60° latitude.
Polar cell	Smallest & weakest cell that occurs from the poles to the Ferrel cell.

Climate Zones

The global circulation system controls temperatures by influencing precipitation and the prevailing winds. This creates distinctive climate zones.
Temperate Climate	Mid-latitude, 30° - 60° north & south of the Equator. Here air rises and cools to form clouds and therefore frequent rainfall, e.g. UK.
Tropical Climate	Found along the Equatorial belt, this zone experiences heavy rainfall and thunderstorms, e.g. Brazil.
Polar Climate	Within the polar zones cold air sinks causing dry, icy and strong winds, e.g. Antarctica.
Desert Climate	30° north and south of the equator, sinking dry air leads to high temperatures without conditions for rainfall, e.g. Libya.

High and Low Pressure
High Pressure	Low Pressure

What is wind?

Wind is the movement of

Distribution of Droughts
Drought can occur anywhere throughout the world but they are more frequent and severe along the tropics of Cancer and Capricorn. Australia and many countries within Africa, such as Ethiopia, suffer from severe drought conditions.
Causes of Drought: El Niño effect

The El Niño effect is also associated with creating dry conditions.

Normally, WARM WATER CURRENTS off the coast of Australia cause WINDY WEATHER to rise and precipitate, causing storms and rain over Australia.

In an El Niño year (every 2-7 years) the COLD CURRENTS. Cooler water off the coast of Australia reverses the wind direction leading to dry weather over Australia causing hot weather and a lack of rainfall.

Topic 1

Global Hazards

Extremes in weather conditions
Wellington, New Zealand Very high wind speeds (210km/h) due to the surrounding mountains funneling wind.	Pyroclastic flows Found along the equator, high temperatures lead to rapid condensation and heavy rainfall.

Distribution of Tropical Storms
They are known by many names, including hurricanes (North America), typhoons (India) and cyclones (Japan and East Asia). They all occur in a band that lies roughly between the tropics of Cancer and Capricorn and despite varying wind speeds are ferocious storms. Some storms can form just outside of the tropics, but generally the distribution of these storms is controlled by the places where sea temperatures rise above 27°C.

Formation of Tropical Storms
1	The sun's rays heat large areas of ocean in the summer. This causes warm, moist air to rise over the particular spots.
2	Once the temperature is 27°C, the rising warm moist air leads to a low pressure. This eventually turns into a thunderstorm. The clouds are to be sucked in from the trade winds.
3	With trade winds blowing in the opposite direction and the rotation of earth involved (Coriolis effect), the thunderstorm will eventually start to spin.
4	When the storm begins to spin faster than thought, a tropical storm (such as a hurricane) is officially born.
5	With the tropical storm growing in power, more cool air sinks in the centre of the storm, creating calm, clear condition called the eye of the storm.
6	When the tropical storm hit land, it loses its energy source (the warm ocean) and it begins to lose strength. Eventually it will 'blow itself out'.

Case study: UK Heatwave 2003

Exams
The heatwave was caused by an anticyclone (areas of high pressure) that stayed in the area for most of August. This blocked any low pressure systems that normally bring milder and cloudier conditions.
