Research has shown that people who are more socially connected are more likely to be healthy and live longer. This is because social connections provide emotional support, reduce stress, and encourage healthy behaviors. For example, people who are part of a social network are more likely to exercise, eat healthy, and avoid risky behaviors like smoking and drinking. Additionally, social connections can provide a sense of purpose and meaning, which are important for mental health. Therefore, it is important to maintain and strengthen social connections throughout life.
