Gironés, 1888 Modern Women Poets of Spanish America Sidonia Carmen Rosenbaum, 1945 In this work I have proposed to study mainly that writer who was the first in point of time and second to none in her poetic worth Delmira Agustini In order to place her within the proper historical perspective I have felt it pertinent and necessary to give as introduction some idea of the work of the women poets who preceded her and also of her influence on modern feminine literature In doing the latter I have seen that rather than to determine the influence itself it was important to establish her relation to the other great women poets who appeared immediately afterwards with distinct and different personalities Delmira undoubtedly had an influence upon them all setting the example as well as giving the initial impulse But they cannot by any manner of means be considered merely her followers or imitators The other three major poetesses mentioned were chosen because they have an indubitable originality that makes them differ from Delmira Agustini and from each other With the object of becoming better acquainted with Delmira therefore I have deemed it important to characterize the others sufficiently to show not only their similarities to the Uruguayan poetess but also the differences between them Consequently I have devoted a study to each not as extensive as they would merit were they to be treated singly but ample and detailed enough to give an idea of their worth and particular significance Introduction
