Associated Problems With Water Treatment System

The water treatment system report sheds light on the associated problems, water treatment systems, treatment technologies, and application domains to better understand the trends and innovations. The major challenges faced by water treatment systems are discussed in this section. The quality of wastewater is tested before treatment. Some of the main parameters considered while testing are as follows:

- Taste & Odor of water: Without proper maintenance, treatment plants can smell foully. The obvious smell is that of sewage. Some other odours like the smell of rotten eggs from the hydrogen sulphide as well as a whiff of ammonia get accumulated.
- Cost: The installation cost of a water treatment plant can be seen as a disadvantage. However, once installed, up and running the costs are minimal and the life of the system will extend past that of a septic tank.
- TDS: The level of TDS (total dissolved solids) in drinking water affects the taste of the water. Higher levels of TDS can make the water bitter in taste, salty, foully or brackish.
- Hardness: Higher levels of magnesium and calcium result in hard water. This hard water gets collected in pipes. This will turn into the expensive replacement of pipes and also reduces the lifetime of home appliances.
- Chlorine level: High chlorine levels in drinking water can cause adverse health effects. Some of these effects occur due to the chlorine which tends to form trihalomethanes. Trihalomethanes (THMs), form when chlorine reacts with small organic particles found in water.
- Contaminants: Nitrate exposure to water can be dangerous, especially to infants as it can lead to methemoglobinemia or the "baby blue syndrome".
