

Samuel looked at the dark green door at the end of the corridor. It was the one room that the professor had asked him not to enter. However, having visited every other room in the house, he was now obsessed by this last door. And he was still convinced that he had heard a woman's scream in the night which could have only come from behind that door. Walking slowly up the corridor towards the door, he looked behind himself to check he was alone. The handle turned easily and the door opened. Not being locked, Samuel opened it further. 'Hello?' he called into the darkness beyond. Through the silence, he could hear faint breathing ...

Presentation

Use participial clauses to describe actions that happen simultaneously or consecutively.

- Present participles are formed with verb + -ing:
Walking slowly up the corridor towards the door, he looked behind himself.
Not having a key, he pushed hard on the door.
- Perfect participles are formed with having + past participle:
Having visited every other room in the house, he was now obsessed by this last door.
Not having been in that room before, he didn't know what he'd find.

The main clause of the sentence describes the most important event and the participial clause a secondary event:

If we want to emphasise that the first action finished before the second, we use the perfect participle:

Participle clauses can also express the following ideas:

- Time
When I look back on my childhood, I think my father was right about many things. → Look back on my childhood, I think my father was right about many things.
- Cause
Because he was a doctor, he was naturally curious. → Being a doctor, he was naturally curious.
- Result
The door wasn't locked. As a result, it allowed him to enter the room. → The door wasn't locked, allowing him to enter the room.

Note: The subject of a participle clause is the same as the subject of the main clause.
