As you might generalize, language is all around us – from the way we speak and communicate with one another, to the books that we read, even when we use our body to give away signals of pleasure, pain and excitement. And as our world transitions to the online age, when communication is no longer personal, linguists still continue to study the emerging language mediums. The field of linguistics is particularly interested with the use of language in everyday landscape in different contexts. Since the Internet is highly used and online content suggests defining contexts to the netizen, linguists consider pictures, signs, and photos as having ideologies that talk to people exposed in these kinds of multilingual landscape.

As part of the online age, you have to be good in examining how signs communicate with you in the context of the author and the reader/recipient in the emerging linguistics landscapes.

A. LINGUISTIC LANDSCAPES

When you find yourself lost in an unfamiliar place, you would first look around for signs that may tell you where you actually are. You would look for street names, billboards, signage, or even bills posted on walls and posts. Those signs will help you familiarize yourself in the surrounding and may signal you about a familiar thing that may make you identify your location. The things that you can actually see that do not necessarily need words to express a thought is called linguistic landscape.
