As shown by chapter introduction concepts, interpersonal communication plays important role in Chapter 10. It is important for the whole communication process.

Chapter 10: Interpersonal Communication

1. What are the main components of interpersonal communication?

Interpersonal communication is a process of exchanging information and feelings.

It includes verbal communication, nonverbal communication, and written communication.

The process of interpersonal communication is as follows:

1. Sender: The person who initiates the communication process. They encode their message into a form that can be transmitted.

2. Receiver: The person who receives the communication. They decode the message and interpret its meaning.

3. Channel: The medium through which the message is transmitted.

4. Feedback: The response to the message, which allows the sender to know if the message was received and understood.

5. Context: The situation or environment in which the communication takes place.

6. Noise: Any factor that interferes with the communication process, such as physical noise, psychological noise, or semantic noise.

7. Relationship: The relationship between the sender and the receiver, which can affect the communication process.

8. Culture: The cultural background of the sender and receiver, which can affect the communication process.

9. Power: The influence or control that one person has over another.

10. Self-concept: The way a person views themselves, which can affect their communication style.

11. Attitudes: The feelings or beliefs that a person has about a person or a situation, which can affect their communication style.
