

CCSS-ELA

Suggestions and Cautions for Implementing the Reading Standards

Shelia W. Valencia ■ Karen K. Wilson

The majority of states have adopted the Common Core State Standards for English Language Arts and Literacy in History/Social Studies, Science, and Technical Subjects (CCSS-ELA), and assessments aligned with the Standards are scheduled to come online in 2014–2015. It is no surprise, then, that classroom teachers and school-district personnel are focusing enormous attention on understanding the Standards and learning how to teach to them. Like other prior initiatives to improve educational outcomes by implementing new standards and assessments, this effort will succeed in improving students' reading only if we understand the thinking that underlies the Standards, keep that thinking front and center, and attend to the full array of contextual factors that influence student achievement (e.g., poverty, language, community, school leadership) (Coburn, Pearson, & Woulfin, 2011; Taylor, Raphael, & Au, 2011; Valencia & Wilson, 2009).

Too often, attention is diverted from the important overarching goals to the smallest, most specific elements of the Standards that look very much like traditional reading skills and strategies (Valencia & Wilson, 2001). Together with the pressure of high-stakes assessment that often accompanies standards-based reform, this focus on the details, without consideration of the big ideas, often results in misguided instruction and the ultimate failure of reading standards to produce better learning and teaching. Our purpose here is to help consumers of the Standards avoid these missteps by offering some suggestions and cautions we believe will support effective implementation of the CCSS-ELA.

Understanding the Vision

Suggestions

We recommend that everyone (teachers, administrators, parents, assessment directors, etc.) begin their work with the CCSS-ELA by reading and discussing the introduction to the document on pages 3–8 (National Governors' Association Center for Best Practices & Council of Chief State School Officers, 2010). Here, the intent of the CCSS-ELA is explained, and a portrait of students who meet the Standards is described:

Students who meet the Standards readily undertake the close, attentive reading that is at the heart of understanding and enjoying complex works of literature. They habitually perform the critical reading necessary to pick carefully through the staggering amount of information available today in print and digitally. They actively seek the wide, deep, and thoughtful engagement with high-quality literary and informational texts that builds knowledge, enlarges experience, and broadens worldviews. (p. 3)

For most of us, the goals and vision for the Standards will ring authentic, rigorous, and worthy of instruction.

We suggest that decisions related to curriculum and instruction intended to help students achieve the Standards must always be done in the context of the CCSS-ELA vision. The importance of staying focused on this vision becomes even more apparent when we consider the specific Grade-Level Standards in the next section.

Cautions

The introduction to the CCSS-ELA makes clear several other points that we believe are important for teachers and administrators to understand:
