The 1990s' changing climate is a critical stage in the evolution of the regulatory environment around those chemicals already in use. Numerous scientific studies and their subsequent findings have shown that the chemicals in use today have the potential to cause long-term health and environmental problems. The data generated by the scientific study community is convincing and compelling, and the principles of good regulation for chemicals are being defined and refined in the regulatory process. Moving up the regulatory agenda is a high priority.

During the 1990s, the "new" generation of international students had a high level of computer literacy, and many of them had a strong interest in computer science. In addition, many of them had a strong interest in business, and many of them had a strong interest in engineering. This generation of students was also more likely to be from developing countries, and many of them had a strong interest in science and technology.
