AP1.15 (a) When comparing data sets it is expected that center, spread, and shape will be addressed. The median for the distribution of cardiovascular fitness measures for machine A (28) is lower than the median of the distribution of cardiovascular fitness measures for machine B (38). The range for the distribution of cardiovascular fitness measures for machine A is substantially smaller than the range of the distribution of cardiovascular fitness measures for machine B ($32 < 57$). (Alternatively, the IQR for machine A ($37 - 22 = 15$) is lower than the IQR for machine B ($47 - 25 = 22$).) The distribution of cardiovascular fitness measures for machine A is reasonably symmetric in shape, while the distribution of cardiovascular fitness measures for machine B is skewed to the left (toward the lower values). In general, the cardiovascular fitness measures for machine B tend to be higher than those for machine A. (b) The company should choose machine B if they want to advertise it as achieving the highest overall gain in cardiovascular fitness. The median for machine B is higher than it is for machine A, as is the mean ($\bar{x}_B = 35.4$ versus $\bar{x}_A = 28.9$). (c) The company should choose machine A if they want to advertise it as achieving the most consistent gains in cardiovascular fitness. Machine A exhibits less variation in gains than does machine B. The IQR for machine A is 15, while the IQR for machine B is 22. Additionally, the standard deviation for machine A is 9.38, while the standard deviation for machine B is 16.19. (d) Volunteers were used for the experiment and these volunteers may be different in some way from the general population of those who are interested in cardiovascular fitness. Another reason is that the experiment was conducted at only one fitness center. Results may vary at other fitness centers in this city and in other cities.

If the company had taken a random sample of all people who were interested in cardiovascular fitness it could infer to this much larger population. If the company had randomly selected a number of fitness centers from across the country and then randomly selected members of each fitness center to participate
