

Two different commissions studied the evidence related to this disease. The first commission ended its investigation with these conclusions: "(1) According to the weight of evidence (the) disease (is) due to infection with a living micro-organism of unknown nature; (2) A possible location for this infection is the intestinal tract; and (3) Deficient animal protein in the diet may constitute a predisposing factor in the contraction of the disease."

Two years later, the second commission concluded that: "(1) The supposition that the ingestion of good or spoiled maize is the essential cause of (the disease) is not supported by our study; and (2) (The disease) is in all probability a specific infectious disease communicable from person to person by means at present unknown."

A year later, the commission presented the following at the annual meeting of the American Medical Association:

"In the group of incident cases most thoroughly studied, evidence of close association with a preexisting case was disclosed in more than 80 per cent.

"A house-to-house canvass of the homes of over 5,000 people living in six endemic foci of (the disease) failed to disclose any definite relation of the disease to any element of the diet.

"In these six villages new cases originated almost exclusively in a house in which a preexisting case was living, or next door to such a house, suggesting that the disease has spread from old cases as centers."

Question 12: For each of the epidemiologic characteristics of time, place, and person, which etiologic hypothesis (infectious vs. dietary) is more compatible with the data?

Question 13: How might you test the infectious or dietary hypothesis about the cause of the disease?
