calculations and others using unweighted scales Due to these inconsistencies it is often difficult to compare HSGPAs across high schools This study involved the coding of 551 high school transcripts of pre med college students in Texas Unweighted HSGPAs were then calculated for each of these students on a standard 4.0 scale Three multiple regression models were then created for the students with complete data n=520 and it was found that unweighted HSGPAs are statistically significant predictors of college GPA CGPA Additionally in the presence of certain conditions specific demographic variables as well as SAT scores were also indicative of measures of academic success as defined in this study as the student's CGPA whether the student took the Medical College Admissions Test MCAT and the score the student achieved on the MCAT In light of our findings we strongly suggest discontinuing the use of the current system of weighted HSGPAs as predictive measures for gauging the likelihood of future academic success
