Constructing and analyzing pedigrees from breeding and family data. When constructing a pedigree from data of families, breeders should distinguish between affected individuals that are mating and breeders that are nonmating breeders. Pedigrees are most often used by genetic researchers to identify causes for genetic disorders. However, breeders do so for different reasons. Breeders require pedigree information to identify breeding animals that are suitable for their purposes. Pedigree information is also used for selection and breeding. The following symbols are used in pedigree construction:

- Mating's members represent consanguinity
- Mating members represent individuals in other generations that are left by right
- Mating individuals for consanguinity
- Mating individuals for selection and breeding
