Museum Property Handbook

Chapter 3 Cataloging

---

Cataloging provides the key for physical and intellectual access to museum property and is an integral part of museum property management. Cataloging obtains information from accession records, associated documentation, physical description, and interpretative research about museum property. Cataloging encompasses several steps in the process of establishing accountability for, and access to, museum property. Accessioning is the first step in achieving accountability. The next step involves completing the catalog record. The cataloging process assigns an identifying catalog number to each object or specimen, or group of objects or specimens that are lot cataloged (see Appendix E). The unique catalog number is placed directly on the museum property, or on a label attached to the objects or specimens. This number is the key connecting object or specimen information directly with the actual object or specimen.

Bureaus should provide guidelines for a bureauwide cataloging system and approve the cataloging system in use at each unit. The required components of a cataloging system are identified in this Chapter. Bureau museum property must be documented with mandatory data described in this Chapter. It is strongly recommended that mandatory data be supplemented with data appropriate to the discipline selected from the "Highly Recommended Data" Section in the Optional Data Appendices M and N.

A. PROCEDURES FOR CATALOGING

The following are components of a cataloging system.

1. The Catalog Record

The completion of a catalog record is mandatory for each object or specimen or group of objects or specimens, as appropriate to the discipline. The catalog record may be as valuable as the museum property itself and may outlast the object or specimen. The catalog record constitutes the primary property and collection management record of museum property. The catalog record serves as an index to additional sources of information and facilitates physical and intellectual access to museum property. The catalog record includes data that enable the bureau or unit to generate a variety of reports by data categories
