Diabetes mellitus (DM) is a global epidemic and affects populations in both developing and developed countries, with differing health care and resource levels. Diabetic retinopathy (DR) is a major complication of DM and a leading cause of vision loss in working middle-aged adults. Vision loss from DR can be prevented with broad-level public health strategies, but these need to be tailored to a country's and population's resource setting. Designing DR screening programs, with appropriate and timely referral to facilities with trained eye care professionals, and using cost-effective treatment for vision-threatening levels of DR can prevent vision loss. The International Council of Ophthalmology Guidelines for Diabetic Eye Care 2017 summarize and offer a comprehensive guide for DR screening, referral and follow-up schedules for DR, and appropriate management of vision-threatening DR, including diabetic macular edema (DME) and proliferative DR, for countries with high- and low- or intermediate-resource settings. The guidelines include updated evidence on screening and referral criteria, the minimum requirements for a screening vision and retinal examination, follow-up care, and management of DR and DME, including laser photocoagulation and appropriate use of intravitreal anti-vascular endothelial growth factor inhibitors and, in specific situations, intravitreal corticosteroids. Recommendations for management of DR in patients during pregnancy and with concomitant cataract also are included. The guidelines offer suggestions for monitoring outcomes and indicators of success at a population level. Ophthalmology 2018;■:1–15 © 2018 by the American Academy of Ophthalmology

Diabetic mellitus (DM) is a global epidemic with significant morbidity and mortality, affecting not only populations in highly developed countries such as the United States, the United Kingdom, and those of Western Europe, but increasingly also developing countries, including China, India, South America, and Africa.^{1–6} By 2040, of the 600 million people worldwide with DM, 400 to 500 million will live in low- and middle-income countries.⁷ Thus, the impact of DM poses a substantial challenge to the health care systems in many developing countries.^{8–10}

Diabetic retinopathy (DR) is a common and specific microvascular complication that develops over time.¹¹ Severe stages of DR, including proliferative DR (PDR) and diabetic macular edema (DME),¹² result in visual impairment and blindness without treatment. Epidemiologic studies have shown that approximately 1 in 3 persons with DM has DR, and 1 in 10 has PDR or DME.^{12–15} Based on these rates, between 100 million and 120 million people have DR and possibly 20 million to 30 million have PDR or DME. However, of concern is that population surveys consistently show that half of persons with DM remain undiagnosed^{16–18} and that many are unaware of their risk of DR and other complications.¹⁹

There are highly effective and cost-effective treatments for PDR and DME, demonstrated over 3 decades with landmark randomized clinical trials that show up to 98% of the blindness could be prevented by timely treatment with laser photocoagulation therapy and vitrectomy surgery,²⁰ and, in the past decade, intraocular injections of anti-vascular endothelial growth factor (VEGF) inhibitors for DME.^{21–23} There is also evidence that intravitreal injections of corticosteroids may be useful for DME management, particularly in eyes with previous cataract surgery.^{24–26} These treatments, coupled with the concept of earlier detection and systemic management of DM, such as intensive glucose and blood pressure control, have led to observations of declining rates of vision loss resulting from DR in the United States, Western Europe, and many countries over time.^{2,27,28}
