Teachers' Standards

How should they be used?

‘Nothing has more impact on a child’s achievement than the quality of teaching they receive and in the new standards for teachers we have prioritised the importance of classroom practice and subject knowledge.’

Samy Sealy-Cudde, Chair of the independent Review of Teachers' Standards and Principal of Sutton Trust (James Academy)

What are the Teachers' Standards?

- The Teachers' Standards set a clear baseline of expectations for the professional practice and conduct of teachers and define the minimum level of practice expected of teachers in England.
- They were developed by an independent review group made up of leading teachers, headteachers and other experts.

Practising teachers can use the Teachers' Standards to support their own professional development and growth.

- They can be used by individual teachers to review their practice and inform their plans for continuing professional development.
- The most successful education systems in the world are characterised by high levels of teacher observation. Teachers benefit from observing one another's practice in the classroom. Teachers learn best from other professionals. Observing teaching and being observed, and having the opportunity to plan, prepare, reflect and teach with other teachers can help to improve the quality of teaching.

- Many teachers are keen to improve their own practice by having feedback on their teaching from colleagues and from observing the Headteachers and others should use the Teachers' Standards to improve standards of teaching in their schools, by setting minimum expectations and assessing performance against them.

- The Teachers' Standards must be used by maintained schools to assess teachers' performance. They can be used by all schools and teachers to clarify development needs and plan professional development.
- Headteachers and other approvers should use their professional judgement and common sense to assess teachers to a level that is consistent with what should reasonably be expected of that teacher given their role and level of experience.
- Teachers applying to access the upper pay range will be assessed as to whether they are highly competent in all elements of the
