

4. Create an anchor chart that is organized as below. Give the students the tip, "Remember, 'give me five!' They can use their hand with the five fingers to help them recall what to include. You can structure the chart as a drawing of a hand with the five items on five fingers if you think the visual will be helpful to your students.

Give Me Five- Five Must-Haves for a Great Book Report!

1.	What's the title?
2.	Who is the author? Is there an illustrator?
3.	What's the story mainly about?
4.	What is your favorite part?
5.	What did you like about this book?

5. Have students select a partner and a text from the classroom library that they can read independently. If you do not have a classroom library, feel free to use the resources for free online e-books included in the additional resources page. Have partners complete a book report form on Activity Page One together. Conference with each pair at completion. Have them read you their report with their text at hand so you can check for accuracy and if key information is included.
6. Have students work independently on the activity page two and practice page.
7. Assign the task of independently creating a book report for homework. As a closing activity, have students present their reports to the class or to small groups within the class.

Student Supplies:

Writing utensils, paper, handouts, texts for students.

Prepare Ahead of Time:

Prepare copies of handouts.

Options for Lesson: Day one: Students will complete the warm up activity and then watch the teacher navigate the sample passage and report. Together, they will complete the anchor chart which discusses the steps of creating a book report. Students will complete activity page 1 with a partner.

Day Two: Students complete the second activity page and practice page independently. Teacher will go over these assessments and assign homework. Students conclude by presenting their book reports to the class/ small groups within the class.
