Forms of Energy

Energy is the ability to do work or cause a change. We use energy every day, and it comes in many different forms. Let's discuss some of the most common forms of energy.

When you turn on your lamp, you are using light energy. This type of energy travels in a straight line. Light energy can reflect, or bounce off objects like mirrors. It can also bend, or refract, like when it shines through water. Light energy can also be absorbed, like when a rock absorbs the light of the Sun and warms up.

Speaking of warming things up, another form of energy is heat, or thermal energy. This type of energy can be experienced by rubbing things together, like your hands. Usually, objects that give off light energy will also give off heat energy, so keep your fingers off the lightbulbs in your lamp!

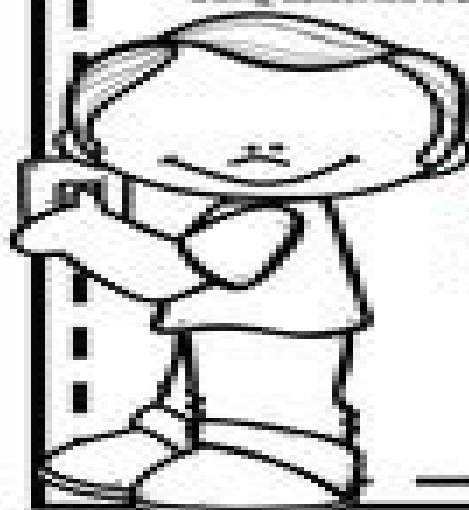

Sound energy travels in waves. This type of energy is created by vibrations, or quick back and forth movements. A great example of this movement is the motion of a guitar's strings when they are plucked.

The energy of motion is called mechanical energy. When parts are moving, we experience this type of energy. A whirling ceiling fan and a person cutting with scissors are great examples of mechanical energy. We can also harness the power of moving water, or hydroelectric power, and moving wind by using wind turbines.

Using batteries is an example of chemical energy. This is the energy used by burning matter.

When you use energy from the foods you eat to run and jump, this is chemical energy too. Your car also uses chemical energy when it burns gasoline to move.

Finally, every time you plug something in at home, you are using electrical energy. This energy comes from the movement of electrons through wires inside your walls. When you watch TV, you are using electrical energy.
