Abstract: A 45-year-old woman presented to the Emergency Department complaining of severe headache for 3 hours duration associated with bilateral blurred vision, photophobia, and one attack of vomiting. Her clinical examination revealed normal vital signs and decrease in visual acuity with hazy cornea bilaterally. There were no signs of increased intracranial pressure and no neck rigidity or meningeal signs. The patient was diagnosed with bilateral acute closed angle glaucoma (AACG) with intraocular pressure of 60 mmHg in both eyes. She was using escitalopram for the treatment of depression, which was the only known risk factor for her condition. Standard treatment for AACG was provided. It included topical β -blocker, α agonists, and acetazolamide. This was followed by bilateral peripheral iridotomy. Follow-up intraocular pressure measurement revealed a value of 5 mmHg after 24 hours, indicating complete recovery. To the best of our knowledge, this is the first case to describe AACG after stopping the medication. It is highly important that clinicians be aware of this risk factor for AACG and have high index of suspicion in such patients with vision-threatening condition even after discontinuing the medication, because the risk persists for some time.

Keywords: acute closed angle glaucoma, escitalopram, intraocular pressure

Background

By 2020, 79.6 million people will have open and closure angle glaucoma, and this will be the second leading cause of blindness in the world.¹ Angle-closure glaucoma is characterized by narrowing or closure of the anterior chamber angle of the eye. Patients present with decreased vision, halos around lights, headache, severe eye pain, and vomiting. Eye examination usually shows conjunctival redness, corneal edema or clouding, shallow anterior chambers, and mid-dilated pupils (4–6 mm) that react poorly to light. Angle-closure glaucoma is divided into two main groups: primary – in which patients are anatomically predisposed to this type of glaucoma with no identifiable risk factor – and secondary – which includes the presence of known cause for narrowing or closure of the anterior chamber angle.² Drugs were found to be among those secondary causes. The eye is prone to drug-related adverse effects due, in part, to its extensive blood supply and relatively small mass. Examples of these drugs include topical anticholinergic or sympathomimetic dilating drops, some antidepressants such as tricyclic and selective serotonin reuptake inhibitor (SSRI), monoamine oxidase inhibitors, antihistamines, antiparkinsonian drugs, antipsychotic medications, and antispasmodic agents.^{2–5} According to one study, 33% of acute closed angle glaucoma is secondary to over-the-counter and prescription medications.⁶
