

Changes in Frequency of Melanic Peppered Moths

In the 1940s and 1950s, coal burning was still at intense levels around the industrial centers of Manchester and Liverpool. During this time, the melanic form of the moth was still very dominant. In the rural areas further south and west of these industrial centers, the occurrence of the gray form increased dramatically. Subsequently (1960–1980), air quality improved with the decline of coal burning factories and the introduction of the Clean Air Act in cities. Sulfur dioxide and smoke levels dropped to a fraction of their previous levels. This coincided with a sharp fall in the relative numbers of melanic moths (right).

- The populations of peppered moth in England have undergone changes in the frequency of an obvious phenotypic character over the last 150 years. Describe the phenotypic character that changed in its frequency:

- Identify the (proposed) selective agent for phenotypic change in Biston:

 - How has the selection pressure on the light colored morph changed with changing environmental conditions over the last 150 years?

- The industrial centers for England in 1950 were located around London, Birmingham, Liverpool, Manchester, and Leeds. Glasgow in Scotland also had a large industrial base. Comment on how the relative frequencies of the two forms of peppered moth were affected by the geographic location of industrial regions:

- The level of pollution dropped around Manchester and Liverpool between 1960 and 1985.
 - State how much the pollution dropped by: _____
 - Describe how the frequency of the darker melanic form responded to this reduced pollution: _____

- In the example of the peppered moths, state whether the selection pressure is disruptive, stabilizing, or directional:

- Outline the key difference between natural and artificial selection: _____
- Discuss the statement "the environment directs natural selection": _____
