The eastern sky glows pink and orange. The sun peeks up, blood red. It rises ever so slowly until it is a perfectly round, fiery ball balanced on the edge of the earth. I feel the presence of someone else on the ledge. I turn my head, expecting to see an ancient Maya welcoming the sun god back from the underworld, but no one is there.

As the sun lights up the world, I look out over the ruins of the city. The beautiful temples and buildings in the plaza below are deserted or abandoned. A thousand years ago, tens of thousands of people lived in Chichén Itzá. But by the time the Spaniards (people from Spain) arrived in southern Mexico five hundred years ago, Chichén Itzá, like most Maya cities, was abandoned. Why?

The jungle that stretches before me is broken by a patchwork of cornfields. In ancient times, as now, corn was a staple food of people in this area. But the soils of tropical forests are fragile. Too much farming can wear them out. Archeologists, who study the lives of ancient people, believe environmental damage may have caused the destruction of the old Maya civilization. Perhaps Maya farmers were unable to supply enough food for the growing populations in the cities. I gaze or look across the plaza below to the Temple of the Warriors. Battle scenes carved and painted on the walls of some Maya temples show that the ancient Maya were warlike. Perhaps war caused the destruction of their civilization. Some archeologists think invaders from the west conquered the Maya. No one knows for sure.

I inch my way carefully along the ledge to the main entrance of the temple and step inside. The stone walls of the chamber are cold. A shiver runs down my body. Against the back wall, a dark doorway leads to the inner sanctum. As I approach it, my footsteps sound unnaturally loud in the ghostly silence. I stop short when I hear a sound from within. There is something moving in the heart of Kukulcán's temple! Could it be the ghost of a Maya priest? Kukulcán himself? Then I hear a squeak. As my eyes adjust to the dark, I spot them high in an alcove—bats—making themselves comfortable for their day's sleep.

Back on the ledge, I think of the climb down. Fear churns in my stomach. Crouched low, I put one foot over the edge, searching for a step I cannot see. I dislodge a pebble, and it clatters to the ground. My foot finally finds the first step, then the next. Slowly and carefully, I work my way to the bottom.
