

Homeostasis & feedback loops

Homeostasis refers to any process an organism uses to maintain stable internal conditions. It is a self-regulating process and often relies on the nervous system and endocrine system working together.

A negative feedback loop is one where the body tries to maintain homeostasis. The endocrine system uses hormones to help stabilize internal conditions.

Examples of conditions regulated by negative feedback:

- Human body temperature
- Human blood pressure
- Blood sugar
- Calcium levels
- Metabolism (Thyroid)
- Water balance (ADH)

In negative feedback, if an endocrine gland detects that there is too much of one hormone in the body, it will initiate changes to decrease production of that hormone.

If there is not enough of that hormone, the endocrine gland will increase production of that hormone.

In a negative feedback loop, the endocrine system uses hormones to help stabilize internal conditions. The endocrine system is made up of glands that secrete hormones into the bloodstream. These hormones then travel through the bloodstream to target cells, where they can cause a response that helps stabilize the internal environment.

Target Cells

If the amount of a particular hormone increases, it can cause a response in the target cells. The endocrine system uses hormones to help stabilize internal conditions.
