

Chapter 10: Ecology

Compiled by Gorjana Bezmalinovic

Laboratory Objectives

By the end of today's session students should be able to:

1. Define ecological levels of organization.
2. Identify biotic and abiotic factors in a specific ecosystem.
3. Explain the difference between different trophic levels.
4. Draw food chains and food webs.
5. Describe how energy flows through an ecosystem.
6. Explain what LC_{50} is and how indicator organisms are used in bioassays to determine the effect of pollutants.
7. Design their own experiment with Daphnia magna and pollutant λ -cyhalothrin.

Ecology is the branch of biology that studies how organisms interact with each other and with their environment. Biotic, living or organism-related factors, and abiotic, nonliving or physical factors, shape the distribution and abundance of organisms on Earth. Examples of abiotic factors in a terrestrial environment would be sunlight, temperature, air, water, wind, humidity, pH of the soil, etc. In a marine environment salinity, pH levels in the ocean and tides would be important in addition to the previously mentioned factors such as sunlight, temperature, O_2 and CO_2 concentration.

Today's ecologists are quantitative scientists who run controlled experiments, use statistics to find patterns in large datasets, and build mathematical models of ecological interactions. They are experts in not only biology but also biochemistry, physiology, evolution, behavioral biology, molecular biology, as well as geology, chemistry, and physics.

Ecological levels of organization include organism, population, community, ecosystem, and biosphere (Figure 10.1).
