Investigating a self-organizing system like Spontaneous Self-Organization requires a new paradigm to build previously untested ideas through the use of simple, testable models. A fundamental step in this paradigm is to create a simple model of a system that can be tested and then to use the results of the test to refine the model. This iterative process is the essence of the Spontaneous Self-Organization paradigm. The results of the test are used to refine the model, and the process is repeated until the model is sufficiently accurate to be used to predict the behavior of the system.

Following the successful launch of the first study, the second phase of the research is now under way. This involves a more detailed analysis of the data collected from the first study, with a view to identifying the factors that are most likely to influence the success of the research. The second phase of the research is expected to be completed by the end of the year.

These findings regarding the relationship between the degree of the patient's participation in decision making and the patient's satisfaction are consistent with previous research. The patient's participation in decision making is an important factor in patient satisfaction. Patients who are more involved in their medical decisions are more likely to be satisfied with the outcome of the decision. This is because patients who are more involved in their medical decisions are more likely to understand the risks and benefits of the decision, and they are more likely to feel that the decision is their own. This is why it is important for healthcare providers to encourage patients to participate in their medical decisions.
