FSIS Microbiological Hazard Identification Guide For Meat And Poultry Components Of Products Produced By Very Small Plants

Developed in Consultation with the Meat and Poultry Subcommittee of the National Advisory Committee on Microbiological Criteria for Foods
August 26, 1999

Introduction

Background

The Meat and Poultry Subcommittee of the National Advisory Committee on Microbiological Criteria for Foods (NACMCF) was asked by the NACMCF Steering Committee to produce a microbiological hazard identification guide for very small plant operators (plants with less than 10 employees or with annual sales of less than $2.5 million). The purpose of this document is to aid very small plant operators in identifying microbial hazards associated with meat and poultry components in their products. Under section 9 Code of Federal Regulations (CFR) Part 417, all very small plant operators are required to implement Hazard Analysis and Critical Control Point (HACCP) systems by January 2000.

The first step in performing the hazard analysis portion of a HACCP plan is to identify the biological (as referred to in 9 CFR 417), physical, and chemical hazards that may be encountered in the production of a food product. This step is the hazard identification portion of a hazard analysis. This guide is designed to be a simple, easy-to-understand aid to identifying biological (specifically microbiological) hazards in meat and poultry for very small plant operators. It does not provide guidance on biological hazards presented by other components used to assemble combination products, nor does it address hazards that may be introduced by processing procedures. Finally, this guide is designed to assist establishments subject to the regulatory requirements of 9 CFR 417 in complying with those requirements; these regulatory requirements may slightly differ from the various explanations of HACCP developed by NACMCF, the most recent version of which was published in 1997.

How to Use This Guide

The guide consists of tables that identify the microbiological hazards in various process categories of products (Tables i through ix), followed by a justification for the
