

Lab 3.0 – Using Bioinformatics to Investigate Evolutionary Relationships: Make a BLAST!

Introduction:

Genomic information, especially genome-wide (genomewide) sequence, provides insight into the Genomic Database Project, which aims to identify and sequence DNA (20,000,000,000 base pairs) of the human genome. This project is currently sequencing portions of other species, including the fruit fly, mouse and Arabidopsis. The genomic and proteomic sequences of the genome of other species are available for analysis in the public databases and the Internet.

Why is this information important? Being able to identify the protein location and sequence of human genes will allow scientists understand genetic diseases. In addition, knowing about the sequence of proteins other species helps us understand evolutionary relationships among organisms. Many of our genes are identical or similar to those found in other species.

Suppose you identify a single gene that is responsible for a particular disease in fruit flies. Is that same gene responsible for disease? Does it cause similar disease? Is it even better? You specify the gene found through the online genome project to try to locate the same sequence of bases as that in fruit flies. This is called a BLAST (Basic Local Alignment Search Tool) search.

BLAST (Basic Local Alignment Search Tool) is a computer program that compares a query sequence (a DNA or protein sequence) against a database of known sequences. It is used to find sequences that are similar to the query sequence. BLAST is a computer program that compares a query sequence (a DNA or protein sequence) against a database of known sequences. It is used to find sequences that are similar to the query sequence.

In this investigation, you will use BLAST to compare a sequence, and then use the information to construct a phylogenetic tree. Phylogenetic tree is a diagram that shows the evolutionary relationships between species. Phylogenetic tree is a diagram that shows the evolutionary relationships between species.
