The Cold War

Uneasy Allies

The end of World War II saw the defeat of the Axis powers in Germany and Japan and brought freedom and hope to many nations and peoples who had been invaded and conquered by them. The end of the war also brought an end to the uneasy alliance which had been formed between the democratic Western allies (Great Britain, France, and the United States) and the communist Soviet Union (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics or U.S.S.R.). The two superpowers—the United States and the U.S.S.R.—became enemies in 1945 because their beliefs and objectives were completely at odds. This philosophical conflict between the two countries came to be known as the Cold War.

Soviet Areas of Influence

The United States and its democratic allies throughout the world were committed to the spread of democracy and self-rule among all nations, especially those nations liberated from Nazi oppression. (Nazis were members of Hitler's Nationalist Socialist German Worker's Party, which supported nationalism, militarism, and racism.) The Soviet Union, led by dictator Joseph Stalin, was determined to increase its territorial control and subject these nations to its own communist-controlled government.

In Europe the U.S.S.R. occupied Poland, Czechoslovakia, Hungary, Romania, Bulgaria, East Germany, Latvia, and Lithuania and encouraged a communist-controlled government in Yugoslavia. The Soviets increased their influence in Asia by supporting the communist takeover of China. Their efforts to expand communism and the Soviet Union's power were worldwide.

An Iron Curtain Comes Down

Winston Churchill, the great British war leader, declared that an "iron curtain" had come down between the democratic West and the communist Soviet empire in the East. The aggressive efforts of the Soviet Union were met by a policy of containment by the United States and its allies as they tried to keep communism from spreading to other nations. For the most part, the Cold War developed not as an actual shooting war but as a series of actions and reactions by each side as it tried to strengthen its position.

Winston Churchill

Armed to the Teeth

Both sides maintained strong armies, equipped with the most up-to-date weapons. Their navies were equipped with the best ships and most technologically advanced weapons and guidance systems. Their nuclear-powered submarines patrolled the oceans. Soviet and American air forces were stocked with cutting-edge military planes as each side sought to build the fastest and most destructive fleet of fighter jets.
