

Application DBA: Pros and Cons

Pros

- Application DBAs can better focus on an individual application which can result in better service to the developers of that application.
- The Application DBA is more often viewed as an integral component of the development team and therefore is better informed about new developments plans and changes to plans.
- Because the application DBA consistently works on a specific set of applications he can acquire a better overall understanding of how each application works enabling him to better support application developers.
- With a more comprehensive understanding of the application, an application DBA will have a better understanding of how the application impacts the overall business. This knowledge will likely result in the execution of DBA tasks to better support the organization.

Cons

- Application DBAs can lose sight of the overall data needs of the organization because of their narrow focus on a single application.
- The application DBA can become isolated. Lack of communication with a centralized DBA group (if one exists) can result in diminished sharing of skills.
- When application DBAs implement useful procedures it takes more effort to share these procedures among the other DBAs.
- Due to the application-centric nature of an application DBA he can lose sight of new features and functionality being delivered by the DBMS group.
