Historical Context

Between 1945 and the 1970s, post-World War II developments in nuclear technology, as well as the Cold War, shaped American foreign policy. In a bipolar international system, where the national interest meant the survival of the nation, the gateway to the world for American foreign-policy-makers lay in the Soviet Union. American foreign-policy-makers therefore had to take into account the possibility that the Soviet Union, as a superpower, might be able to "outpace America's power" in the near future. This possibility led to the "containment" of the Soviet Union, which was the main goal of American foreign policy during the Cold War. The containment policy was based on the belief that the Soviet Union would not be able to outpace America's power in the near future.
