

Nearly every economy in the world is a mixed economy and they have varying degrees of intervening in the markets. There are several reasons for government intervention. First is to support the firms so as to help them remain competitive by providing subsidies or tax breaks. Second is the governments need money to provide essential services, public and merit goods. This is implemented by raising taxation and privatization. Last is to support poorer households through a range distribution policies such as progressive tax. Two of the common methods to intervene in the economy are maximum price control, minimum price control.

Maximum price control (price ceiling) is set by governments to try to lower prices in a market, only effective or binding if set below the equilibrium price. Common applications of the government trying to do this are usually in terms of health care, in terms of rents or housing prices because these are important things for people. In addition, we want to make sure that people have access to these goods and services. However, price controls mess with the price mechanism and the market mechanism. This would distort incentives and, in this case, actually cause more harm than good in most cases. One real-world application of the policy is the ceiling price on pork in Venezuela.
