

AUTO ELECTRIC CORNER - January 2011

by Mohammad Samii, Samii's Auto-Electric Service, Inc., ASE, SAE

The first snap of extreme cold and snow started our winter season here in the Midwest. Along with the typical battery and starter failures, a good number of other items, mostly snowplow motors, became popular units for a short while.

Stocking up on the most popular snowplow motors is certainly a positive because they usually fail during their operation, or the day before the snow falls when the operators are preparing their machines for the next day's work. Having them in stock is certainly a plus for this highly demanded but seasonal unit.

Along the same lines, we see increases in power-window repair and motor/regulator replacements. Some drivers do not realize the windows are frozen but thanks to our drive-up window culture (or manual Toll Booths), they try to open it anyway, which eventually causes the window motors to fail or the mechanism to break.

Blower motors also are not immune to water intrusion and freeze-ups that certainly ruin the motors and cause all sorts of problems with the control circuits, which are now mostly built into relay modules, and are the subject of repeated failures.

So the winter may have its own drawbacks, but the extreme cold does indeed generate some unexpected work that can perhaps offset the shortage of other industrial work such as home building or construction that usually comes to a halt during the cold winter months.

New Things at the Big R Show

One of the nice things at the Big R show is meeting the suppliers and seeing what is new in their products or on the horizon. The most recent Big R Show was no exception. I saw a few things that I thought would have immediate effect on my work and the rebuilding process. Here I will mention a few, but by no means, are these the ONLY things that were of interest to me or other rebuilders:

1) A new 4-G rotor slip ring was introduced by Industrias Karkwood, S.A. de C.V. that uses flexible leads, thus making cutting the rotor's fan, or removing/re-welding it, no longer necessary. The flexible lead of the slip ring can be slid right under the fan and soldered.

Since a great percentage of the 4-G rotors need slip ring replacement, this one can save a considerable amount of time and make the process much simpler and easier.

Figure 1 shows this slip ring and how it is placed on the rotor without cutting the fan. Currently J&N has added this item to their stock (J13-14017) and they are available for shipping.

Fig. 1 - Ford 4-G Rotor with Flexible Leads Slip Ring installed

2) Rebuilding solenoid in-house is something that is avoided by most small rebuilders. It could be because of the time it takes, or the moderate price and availability of the replacement solenoids that are readily available. But being from the old school, I still rebuild most import and some domestic solenoids in house to maintain OE coil quality along with some money savings, which a pictorial process of it has been shown in various APRA Electrical Clinics. Of course, the savings are much greater when you get into say, Bosch industrial solenoids where a lot of aftermarket replacements fall short in longevity and performance, mostly on construction and heavy machinery.

But if you decide to rebuild your solenoids, you do need good caps and contacts, which are not available from most industry suppliers but only a few. For a few years now I have found out that STC Automotive Inc. (626-575-5981), which is a regular exhibitor at the Big R Show, has probably the most complete line of caps and contacts, and almost whatever else that one needs for rebuilding solenoids as well as alternators and starters. Their General Manager, Mr. Yun Song, has a good grasp of the aftermarket needs and is very helpful in locating hard to find items.

Just a few days before the Big R Show I needed a solenoid cap for a 6785 starter (a Delco PG-260D) cap that I had not seen before (Figure 2). Lo and behold the same cap was on display at the STC booth, plus many other newer caps and solenoids which are very new and are just showing up at our business. They also have a very comprehensive printed catalog that can be had for the asking.

3) In response to a particular demand, D&V Electronics made a new alternator/starter bench-top tester which is supposedly aimed at the jobber and
