

BP1100 - Bell Prover Gas Calibration System

1. Theory of Operation

The BP Bell Prover operates as follows. As gas is displaced through the meter under test, the bell contains it. This causes the bell to rise and as the bell rises, the flow rate is calculated using information supplied by a rotary encoder and pressure and temperature sensing devices.

The computer and interface circuitry which are part of the system provide for various flow meter inputs. Once flow range and specific test meter information are input, the computer prompts the user to set a flow rate. Utilizing a precision valve stack, the operator sets the flow rate. Flow is directed into the bell after the desired flow rate is set. As flow is diverted into the bell, a rotary encoder produces pulses proportional to the linear movement of the bell. Each pulse represents an extremely small, but precise volume of gas displaced through the meter.

At the end of the bell travel, a diverter valve opens allowing the gas to be evacuated from the bell. As the gas is exhausted, the bell returns to the bottom of its travel to the standby position. The system is immediately ready for another calibration run. The design prevents the gas from passing through the flow transducer in a reverse direction.
