

Understanding the logical flow of ideas

When you read a text, you will often notice that it flows from one idea to another in a logical order. Being able to identify the way ideas are organized is an important reading skill. Some commonly used patterns of ordering are described below.

- Order of importance

When information is presented in an ascending order of importance, the least important idea is mentioned first, then the more important ones. It is the other way round when a descending order of importance is used.

- Problem-solution or cause-effect order

Many text types like proposals, editorials and others that involve argumentative or persuasive elements, written to convince readers to support a cause or a course of action, use a problem-solution pattern to present information. A problem is first put forward with aspects of the problem presented. Then a solution is offered. Similarly, if a text follows a cause-effect order, the causes are described first, followed by the effects.
