Using 1995, 2011 Current Population Survey and 1970, 2000 Census data, we find that the fertility, education and labor supply of second generation women US born women with at least one foreign born parent are significantly positively affected by the immigrant generation's levels of these variables with the effect of the fertility and labor supply of women from the mother's source country generally larger than that of women from the father's source country and the effect of the education of men from the father's source country larger than that of women from the mother's source country. We present some evidence that suggests our findings for fertility and labor supply are due to at least in part to intergenerational transmission of gender roles. Transmission rates for immigrant fertility and labor supply between generations are higher than for education but there is considerable intergenerational assimilation toward native levels for all three of these outcomes. Cornell Notes Mountain Creative, 2020-10-17.
