Common Language Description

To perform spirometric forced expiratory flow (FEF) measurement, the infant or child is given a medication before the test to induce sleep. Once asleep, the infant or child is placed in a chest compression jacket. A spirometry device consisting of a mouthpiece and tubing connected to a machine that records and displays results is used to perform the test. Air is forced into the lungs which are expanded to maximum capacity. Forced maneuvers to express the air are then performed using automatic jacket inflation and chest compression. A spirometer is used to measure FEF as the air is expelled from the lungs. The test may be performed a second time after administration of a bronchodilator medication. The test results are displayed on a graph that the physician reviews and interprets in a written report. Use 94011 for FEF performed without use of a bronchodilator on an infant or child through age 2. Use 94012 when FEF is performed before and after administration of a bronchodilator on an infant or child through age 2.
