THEORY

The Superposition Theorem states that if a network of linear impedance's contains more than one Voltage Sources (generators), the current which flows at any point, is the algebraic sum of all currents which would flows at that point of each Voltage Source (generator) was considered separately and all other generators were replaced by their internal impedance's.

This theorem is very useful in solving networks, where more than one voltage or current source in present. It will be interesting to know that the superposition theorem is applicable to the circuits containing resistors, inductors, and capacitors. It is not applicable to the circuit containing active devices such as diodes, transistors is because of the fact, that resistors, inductors, inductors and capacitors are considered as linear and bilateral proportional to the voltage drop across it. While a bilateral component is one in which the current can flow in either direction. The active devices (i.e. diode, transistors etc.) are neither linear nor bilateral devices.

The superposition theorem may be used to determine the current in a component, which exists as a result of each of the sources. It is important to note that while calculating the results for each source, the
