ABOUT THE AP EUROPEAN HISTORY TEST

---

In this chapter, we will examine each of the three types of questions you will encounter on the test: multiple-choice questions, document-based questions, and thematic essays. We will take you step by step through each type of question and show you not only what to expect, but also what the graders of the exam will expect from you. In addition, we will show you exactly how to attack each type of question successfully.

THE MULTIPLE-CHOICE SECTION

The first section of the AP European History test consists of 80 multiple-choice questions that test the entire period of European history that is covered in the AP course (from 1450 to the present). The multiple-choice section counts as 50 percent of your exam grade, and you are allowed 55 minutes to complete the section.

The questions on this section of the exam have been carefully designed and organized by the test-making team at the College Board. Questions aren't scattered haphazardly throughout the exam; they're presented in a precise order that is based on chronology and level of difficulty.

CHRONOLOGY

The multiple-choice questions are placed together in small groups. Within each group, the questions are arranged roughly in chronological order. For example, the first question in a given group may cover the Reformation, while one of the questions in the middle of the group may address the Industrial Revolution. The final question in the group may ask about the post-Cold War Soviet Union. You should be aware that a new group of questions has begun when the the questions change from a more modern subject to one from the very earliest part of the AP European History course.

The multiple-choice section covers the period of time from 1450 to the present and does not only deal with particular topics within that time period. You can count on the questions to be rather consistent in at least one respect. Approximately half of the multiple-choice questions will focus on the time period from the Renaissance through the French
