

oil companies. In 2005, significant foreign ownership existed, including British Petroleum, PLC, the fourth largest refiner, and Total SA, the French oil company. Second, the period since 1981 has seen significant merger and acquisition activity within the U.S. oil industry as oil companies sought to acquire expanded crude oil reserves as well as other assets through acquisition and merger with other firms. As a result of mergers, acquisitions, and corporate strategy, the ownership of many specific refineries has changed hands, even though the total capacity of the corporate entity has remained relatively stable. For example, the Bayway refinery in Linden, New Jersey, with a current capacity of 238,000 barrels per day was owned by ExxonMobil, but is now owned by ConocoPhillips; Conoco and Phillips Petroleum were separate companies in 2005. Third, the industry now has significant capacity operated by firms that are not integrated oil companies at all, but specialize in only a part of the petroleum supply chain. Fourth, specific joint venture organizations, (e.g., Motiva Enterprises) have been created to engage specifically in refining. Joint ventures have become common because they allow for significant cost and risk reductions through asset sharing and rationalization, but do not require the financial and institutional stresses of a more direct union through merger or acquisition.
