The nature of activatory and tolerogenic dendritic cell-derived signal 2 Francesca Granucci,Ivan Zanoni,Manfred B. Lutz,2014-07-08 One of the most interesting issues in immunology is how the innate and adaptive branches of the immune system cooperate in vertebrate organisms to respond and destroy invading microorganisms without destroying self tissues More than 20 years ago Charles Janeway proposed the innate immune recognition theory 1 He hypothesized the existence of innate receptors Pattern recognition receptors PRRs that by recognizing molecular structures associated to pathogens PAMPs and being expressed by antigen presenting cells APCs and epithelial cells could alert the immune system to the presence of a pathogen making it possible to mount an immediate inflammatory response Moreover by transducing the alert signal in professional APCs and inducing the expression of costimulatory molecules these receptors could control the activation of lymphocytes bearing clonal antigen specific receptors thereby promoting appropriate adaptive immune responses Since adaptive immunity can be activated also following sterile inflammatory conditions it was subsequently proposed by Polly Matzinger that the innate immune system could be also activated by endogenous danger signals generically called danger associated molecular patterns DAMPs 2 The first prediction has been amply confirmed by the discovery of Toll like receptors 3 4 5 and cytoplasmic PRRs such as RIG like receptors 6 Other PRR families such as the NOD like receptors and C type lectins exert immunogenic or tolerogenic signals 7 8 9 and may recognize not strictly pathogens but also endogenous danger signals that may lead to inflammasome activation 10 11 Dendritic cells DCs have been identified as the cells of the innate immune system that by sensing PAMPs or DAMPs transduce signals to the nucleus This leads to a transcriptional reprogramming of DCs with the consequent expression of three signals namely signal 1 MHC peptide signal 2 surface costimulatory molecules and signal 3 cytokines necessary for the priming of antigen specific na ve T cell responses signal 1 and 2 and T cell polarization signal 3 The reason why DCs are superior with respect to other professional APCs in na ve T cell activation has not been unequivocally defined but in vivo may mainly result from their migration capacity to secondary lymphoid organs It has not been established whether DCs can provide a special signal 2 or simply very high levels compared with other APCs of commonly expressed signals 1 and 2 so that a na ve T cell could reach the threshold of activation A second aspect of DC biology needs also to be taken into account Concerning the question of how self tissues are not destroyed following the initiation of adaptive immune responses different mechanisms of central and peripheral auto reactive T cell tolerization have been proposed 12 In particular it has been defined that high affinity T cells are deleted in the thymus while low affinity auto reactive T cells or T cells specific for tissue sequestered antigens that do not have access to the thymus are controlled in the periphery In a simplified vision of how peripheral T cell tolerance could be induced and maintained it was thought that in resting conditions immature DCs expressing low levels of signal 1 and low or no levels of signal 2 were able to induce T cell unresponsiveness Nevertheless it is now clear that a fundamental contribution to the peripheral tolerance is due to the conversion of na ve T cells into peripheral regulatory T cells pTreg cells and it is also clear that DCs need to receive a specific conditioning to become able to induce pTreg cell differentiation Even more intriguing is that also DCs activated through PRRs with particular Toll like receptor TLR agonists are capable of generating pTreg cell conversion if these agonists induce the production of the appropriate cytokines     The Gazette of India India,1964-04     Current Law Index ,2000     Yojana ,2014     The Criminal Law Journal ,1986
