The Optimality of Nominal Contracts Scott Freeman, Guido Enrico Tabellini, 1991 Why do we see nominal contracts in the presence of price level risk To answer this question this paper studies an overlapping generations model in which the equilibrium contract form is optimal given the contracts elsewhere in the economy Nominal contracts turn out to be optimal in the presence of aggregate price level risk under two circumstances First if individuals have the same constant degree of relative risk aversion The reason is that in this case nominal contracts eventually coupled with equity contracts lead to optimal risk sharing Second nominal contracts can be optimal even if the first condition is not met if the repayment of contracts is subject to a binding cash in advance constraint The reason is that a contingent contract while reducing purchasing power risk also increases the cash flow risk Under a binding cash in advance constraint on the repayment of contracts this second risk is costly and it is minimized by a nominal contract Finally the paper also identifies some symmetry conditions under which nominal contracts are optimal even in the presence of relative price risk
