

Facilitating Case Studies in Massage Therapy Clinical Education

Amanda Baskwill, BEd, RMT

Humber Institute of Technology and Advanced Learning, Massage Therapy Program, Toronto, ON, Canada

The integration of evidence into reflective health care practice has been on the rise in recent years and is a phenomenon that has affected all health care professions, including massage therapy. Clinical case studies are a research design that follows one patient or subject, making the studies ideal for use in clinical practice. They are valuable for communicating information from clinical practice to the broader community. Case studies have face validity that may be more valuable to individual practitioners than homogeneous randomized controlled trials, as the practitioner may recognize a complex patient in the case report. At Humber College, Student Massage Therapists (SMTs) create, conduct, and communicate results of a clinical case study prior to graduation. This article describes the process and experience.

KEY WORDS: case study; massage therapy; clinical education; research capacity

INTRODUCTION

Clinical case studies, sometimes known as $n = 1$ designs,⁽¹⁾ are a research design that follows one patient or subject—a feature that makes case studies ideal for clinical practice. Despite the inability to generalize the results of a case study to the larger population, they are valuable for communicating information from clinical practice to the broader community, including other health care professionals and researchers. Case studies have face validity that may be more valuable to individual practitioners than homogeneous randomized controlled trials, as the practitioner may recognize a complex patient in the case report.⁽²⁾ On the hierarchy of research, case studies are often found along with qualitative research at the base of the pyramid.⁽³⁾ This illustrates their role as a foundational piece of research. Results from case studies can contribute to the future development of a larger scale study.

Case studies also provide clinicians with a standardized process by which to communicate adverse effects and side effects of, novel approaches to, and both positive and negative unexpected outcomes of, treatment. This is of particular importance in massage therapy as there is a paucity of evidence for many aspects of practice, including safety, efficacy, effectiveness, and cost-effectiveness. This statement is not to suggest that massage therapy is not a useful or cost-effective treatment, rather than more research needs to be conducted on outstanding topics of inquiry to better describe massage therapy practice in general.

The integration of evidence into reflective health care practice has been on the rise in recent years and is a phenomenon that has affected all health care professions, including massage therapy.⁽⁴⁻⁷⁾ Evidence-informed practice (EIP) is the use of the best available evidence, patient values, and practitioner expertise to inform the clinical decision-making process.⁽⁸⁾ In order for a practitioner to engage in evidence-informed practice they must have research literacy skills or the ability to find, understand, analyze, and apply evidence to practice.⁽⁹⁾

Research in massage therapy continues to grow as attitudes around evidence seem to change. Anecdotal evidence points to a greater demand for research in massage therapy to support or refute current practices and reinforce the safety of the practice. This may be, in part, as the result of changing expectations that massage therapists will have skills in research literacy. In 2005, the regulatory authority for massage therapy in Ontario, Canada included research literacy into the entry-to-practice competencies.⁽¹⁰⁾ The 2012 Inter-jurisdictional Competency Document, which will replace the 2005 competency document in Ontario, goes further to require an academic knowledge of evidence-informed practice.⁽¹¹⁾ While it is this author's opinion that evidence-informed practice should be required at least at a simulation level and where possible at a clinical level, this inclusion does demonstrate a change in attitude of the regulators and the profession of massage therapy in Canada.

The faculty in the Massage Therapy Program at Humber College believe the skills of designing, conducting, and communicating the results of a case study are important tools for therapists to have in order to communicate with the larger massage therapy, health care, and research communities. As such, steps were taken to include case study creation and implementation into the curriculum.
