

General Equilibrium Analysis and Economic Efficiency

These changes in demand will also affect public provision of day-care services, as the public sector expands its capacity to supply. We therefore treat public provision as increasing, and introduce government expenditure on day-care, g_{dc} , to the model, and assume that it is financed by all households, proportionately. It is distributed among the potential competitors proportionately. It augments the technology and income available for public or competitive provision without generating additional income.
