Causes of Warts

The HPV virus causes warts. The virus exaggerates the growth of keratin, which is a hard protein that's found on the top layer of the skin.

Different strains of HPV cause different types of warts. The virus that causes them can be transmitted through close skin-to-skin contact or through contact with rough surfaces. The virus may spread to other body parts through:

- Shaving the legs or face
- Sucking on the fingers
- Biting or picking at a wart
- Biting the fingernails

Someone with wet or damaged skin is at risk for infection. For example, if a patient walks around a public swimming pool or uses a public shower and they have a cut on the soles of their feet, they may contract the virus and develop a wart.

It is not as common to get a wart from someone else, but the virus can be spread through contact. Patients with weak immune systems are especially at risk, especially if they have HIV/AIDS or if they are taking an immunosuppressant after an organ transplant.

Handling meat may also increase the risk of developing a wart. One study showed that 33 percent of slaughterhouse staff and 34 percent of butchers have common warts.

Warts are generally harmless, but HPV may cause them on or around the genital area and these may be more serious. These are caused by sexual intercourse and they can potentially cause anal, cervical, vulva or vaginal cancer, as well as cancer of the anus and the penis.
