Medial – toward the midline of the body (opposite lateral)

Lateral – away from the midline of the body (opposite medial)

Superior – toward the head of the body (opposite inferior)

Inferior – toward the tail of the body (opposite superior)

Body Cavities

Vertebrate animals have a number of different body cavities, as illustrated in this figure. There are three main body cavities: the cranial, thoracic, and abdominal cavities. The cranial cavity contains the brain, the thoracic cavity contains the heart and lungs, and the abdominal cavity contains the digestive organs. The cranial cavity is the most important, as it contains the brain, which is the center of the nervous system. The thoracic cavity is the second most important, as it contains the heart and lungs, which are responsible for the circulation of blood. The abdominal cavity is the third most important, as it contains the digestive organs, which are responsible for the breakdown of food into nutrients that can be used by the body.
